Uncovering the Two for Tuesday Archive

There were over two dozen major libraries in the city of Rome during the imperial period, but the capital wasn't the only place that housed dazzling collections of literature. Sometime around 120 A.D., Gaius Julius Aquila, the son of the Roman consul Tiberius Julius Celsus Polemaeanus, completed a memorial library to his father in the city of Ephesus (modern day Turkey). The building's ornate façade still stands today and features a marble stairway and columns as well as four statues representing Wisdom, Virtue, Intelligence and Knowledge. Its interior, meanwhile, consisted of a rectangular chamber and a series of small niches containing bookcases. The library may have held some 12,000 scrolls, but its most striking feature was no doubt Celsus himself, who was buried inside in an ornamental sarcophagus.

Since our own little library of past Two for Tuesday articles is electronic, you won't need a plane ticket to visit it—it's all housed online. The yearly Two for Tuesday Archive is organized by subject. Compare it to the archive listings under BIM or the Archive link at the bottom of every Two for Tuesday. Those are organized by publication date.
